It is stated that immense quantities of cotton are being bought up at the South by citizens of France and England, and that Southern merchants are now making large purchases of goods in the French and English markets, on the understanding that the blockade is to be broken this fall. As our correspondent well observes, the sympathy of the French and English people with the North is one thing; what of the people that the building which then took the name of Lafavette, has been, in their Governments, influenced by the the life-time of some of his early compancommercial spirit, will do, is quite anoions, converted into a dungeon for free ther thing.

In addition to the interest of the French merchant and manufacturer in the South, in common with the English trader, the French Government has a special interest in the article of tobacco. From the import of this commodity it derives an enormous revenue by giving a menopoly of its sale to certain parties, whose agents in arms-of that famous John Eugar have been purchasing it in Virginia ever since the war broke out, just as they did before, All know that the people of France, like the people of the other Powers of Europe, are so beavily taxed that it is almost impossible for their rulers to add another dollar; and if the revenue crany important branch of imports should fail, the Government would break down in their financial affairs and become bankrupt. Tobacco is, therefore, as exsential to France as notion is to England. Both articles are alike needed to prevent revolution in those countries.

The design of the Confederate Goverement is to say to those European erops accumulate in the principle depota, "Your people need these products, and they must have them. Without them they would make revolution. Your own revenue imperatively demands the imto you if you will come and take them with your ships.
